We have tried our best to compare the latest versions of the two applications and we will do our best to explain each of them. Of course, we cannot touch on everything, so if we didn't mention something, that doesn't mean that we're not aware of it and we strongly advise you to do your own homework before you make your decision, as well. Now that we have this review conducted, I am sure that you will make the correct decision. The biggest issue for me is the lack of a traditional darkroom. I'm sorry but the fact that I can't move the canvas and stack photos and manage cropping, masks etc, is what turns me off from most darkroom apps. Trying to do anything on the image on the canvas is hit and miss and on slower connections it just isn't an option. The notion of a darkroom app "for devs" wouldn't be enough novelty for me. I much prefer the darkroom apps of earlier versions to the stock apps. Sure, Adobe's been bold, but what have they got to offer? A few bland checkboxes (turn your photo rectangle to circle, use a mask of some sort), a few inaccurate or unhelpful tool prompts and credits which you won't find anywhere else, and some cryptic symbols. There's also no decent support for layer opacity (only fixed opacity with transparency blending), no way to make a new layer from the shape of your brush, and no way to load images from a directory or directory structure in the app itself. It's infuriating. Photoshop CC 2015 is a great all-round image editor. The new features are too few on a whole bag of 'em. I get the need to remove the ribbon (looks a bit like the Mac menu bar), but are they kidding? They're also not that fun or useful. Why can't, say, your photos auto-save? Why can't you stack photos to edit and save? Why do I have to vote with my mouse for tools to work? Why am I asked to make a couple of purchases?
