The beauty of the new layer system in Photoshop is that you can move, copy and resize things without losing their relationships. In the past, I've added them to the document a few times and then later moved them around. The beauty of the new layer system is that when I do this, I only have to worry about moving the layers in order. This release will improve the overall look of the interface, especially when editing text and brushes. You'll find new dynamic effects that enable you to create unique effects or effects based on a fill or stroke, on layers, on entire images, and on a variety of image selection modes. By using animation, you can watch as the effect fades in or out across layers, producing dynamic effects. You can also create powerful drawings with a needle-style tool. Branding tools generate comprehensive visual effects in just a few clicks. And you get a variety of Photoshop and image effect plugins with plug-ins and effects that add value to images through to Photoshop CS5. In this release, there's a brand new unlocked UI for tools and effects. With a well-thought-out UI, you can concentrate on your creative process without having to waste time with accidentally-clicking menus. Just as in Lightroom 5, Photoshop doesn't work well as a network application. It's running well on a local network, in a separate, unsynced environment. As a result, users can see how the next version is coming along that everyone can use since they don't have to wait for Apple to approve the next release. The program is now built on the Adobe AIR platform. This has less to do with performance and more to do with standardizing the application. What better place to build a popular application? By moving to AIR, you see how Adobe will continue to advance in the future.
